AOKI WILL GO WEST

Visit Has Direct Bearing on Japanese Exclusion.

LOOKING TO LIBERAL TREATY

Subjects of Mikado Already Striving to Secure Broad Rights for Immigrants When Present Pact Expires in 1911—Attitude of Seattle, Portland, and Los Angeles.

Viscount Aoki, the Japanese Ambassador, and several members of the embassy staff, will leave Washington about the middle of next month for a tour of several weeks on the Pacific Coast.

The object of the visit has a direct bearing on the question of Japanese exclusion in the United States, and on the renewal of the treaty of commerce and navigation now in force between this country and Japan. The Ambassador, who is presumably not acting in the matter without the wishes or sanction of his government, purposes to find out for himself what the character of the opposition is on the Pacific Coast against the admission of Japanese laborers to this country.

The Japanese question, which was a burning matter last winter when President Roosevelt interfered with the course that the San Francisco school authorities were taking in regard to the education of Japanese children there, will certainly recur at no distant date and there is reason to believe that the Tokyo government may not assume an attitude of acquiescence, as was the case during the negotiations a few months ago.

Wants More Liberal Treatment.

While it is true that Japan assented to the President's wish that the pending immigration bill should provide for the exclusion of Japanese laborers from the United States, it is by no means certain that it will permit an exclusion feature to be incorporated in a formal treaty between the two countries.

The present treaty will expire in July, 1911, and, although that date is somewhat remote, a campaign has already been started among organizations of Japanese residents on the Pacific Coast, looking toward a renewal of the liberal provisions of the present convention in regard to the admission of immigrants from Japan.

They have recently sent representatives to Washington to talk with Ambassador Aoki, Secretary Straus, and other high government officials. These Japanese have borne letters from some of the most prominent American citizens in the Coast cities, backing up their statements to the Ambassador and to the President that the much-exploited opposition to Japanese in that region centers in and is almost exclusively confined to the trade unions of San Francisco, and to the ring of indicted municipal officers in that city.

Seattle Friendly to Japanese.

The representatives of Japanese associations in Seattle, Portland, and Los Angeles have been supported in their work here by letters, telegrams, and endorsements of various kinds from chambers of commerce and other public organizations in those cities. In Seattle the Japanese laborer is welcomed, and the better class of Japanese take a prominent part in public affairs. Four or five of their number are invited to every large public dinner, and there is an almost entire absence of class distinction in Seattle's treatment of the Japanese. In Portland there is no anti-Japanese feeling worthy of the name. During the height of the San Francisco school controversy, and while the indicted mayor of that city was on his way to Washington in response to President Roosevelt's invitation, the Los Angeles Chamber of Commerce telegraphed to the President that the people of that city did not sympathize with attacks on Japanese residents.

Japan Weakens in Its Attitude.

The present treaty between the United States and Japan, which will expire four years from now, provides for the most liberal treatment of Japanese immigrants. The fact was recognized by William R. Day, when he was Assistant Secretary of State, in a letter saying, "By article 1 of that convention, the subjects of Japan are given full liberty to enter, travel, or reside in, any part of the territories of the United States."

This article was practically nullified by Japan's informal assent to the immigrant legislation enacted by Congress last winter; but there is nothing binding about the agreement which was entered into thus informally at the instance of President Roosevelt. It has lately been represented that the government of Japan has weakened on the question of excluding Japanese of the laboring class from the United States, and that the coming new treaty will, if Japan has its way, insist upon liberal treatment to which no such exception or nullification as that effected by the recent immigration act will be permitted. The trip which Ambassador Aoki is about to make to the Pacific Coast lends color to this statement.

William Reinburg, an employee of the Government Printing Office, died very suddenly of acute indigestion while at his desk yesterday. Mr. Reinburg has been a life-long resident of Washington, was known as a man of unapproachable character, and was held in the highest esteem by relatives and a host of friends, to whom his death came as a great shock.
